Gilbert's father was a Ku Klux Klan member, and his mother was a devout Christian. Gilbert was raised to believe that blacks were inferior to whites, and that violence was the only way to deal with them. However, as he grew older, Gilbert began to question his beliefs. He couldn't understand why his mother, who was so kind and loving, would support such a hateful organization as the Klan. And he couldn't understand why his father, who was so strong and courageous, would resort to violence. After graduating from high school, Gilbert left the South and moved to New York City. There, he met and fell in love with a black woman named Mary. Mary was intelligent, beautiful, and kind. She challenged Gilbert's beliefs about race, and she helped him to see the world in a new way. Gilbert and Mary eventually married and had two children. They lived a happy and fulfilling life together. However, Gilbert never forgot his roots. He always felt a sense of guilt and shame over his father's involvement in the Klan. He knew that he had to do something to make amends.

In 1998, Gilbert returned to the South and founded the Race and Reconciliation Center in Montgomery, Alabama. The center is dedicated to promoting racial healing and understanding. Gilbert has spent the past two decades working to build bridges between blacks and whites. He has spoken at churches, schools, and community events across the country. He has also written a book about his journey, entitled Race and Redemption in the New South.

Gilbert's story is a powerful reminder that it is never too late for reconciliation. Even in the darkest of times, there is always hope for redemption. Gilbert's story is also a testament to the power of love. Love can break down barriers, heal wounds, and create a more just and equitable world.
