In this groundbreaking book, the author draws on extensive research to expose the deep-rooted and systemic racism that has shaped British society for centuries. The author argues that racism is not simply a matter of individual prejudice, but a structural problem that has had a profound impact on the lives of black and minority ethnic people in the UK.

The book begins by examining the history of racism in the UK, from the days of the British Empire to the present day. The author shows how racism has been used to justify the exploitation and oppression of black and minority ethnic people around the world. The author also explores the ways in which racism has been embedded in British institutions, such as the police, justice system, education system, and healthcare system.

The book then goes on to examine the impact of racism on the lives of black and minority ethnic people in the UK. The author draws on extensive research to show how racism affects black and minority ethnic people in all aspects of their lives, from their education and employment prospects to their health and well-being. The author also shows how racism can lead to discrimination, violence, and even death.

The book concludes by calling for urgent action to dismantle racism and build a more just and equitable society. The author argues that we need to challenge racism at all levels of society, from the individual to the institutional. The author also calls for the government to take action to address the root causes of racism, such as poverty, inequality, and discrimination.
